Statement by OSHA
Administrator John
Henshaw on Worker
Memorial Day
April 28, 2004

"Today is Worker Memorial Day, a day to pay tribute to the men and women who have lost their lives on the job. We believe that we pay tribute to them most by working even harder to prevent more deaths on the job. We're making progress; in its most recent data, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that workplace fatality rates in almost all categories were down in 2002. In very basic terms that means that over 400 more mothers, fathers, sons and daughters returned home safely from their workplaces than did the year before."

"The ultimate right of every worker is to return home safely. We must continue working to ensure that that happens. This is a day set aside to not only commemorate the lives of those men and women who went to work one day and didn't come home, but to also remind us that our work isn't finished.
